THE CHEIRON MYTH

CHEIRON, the Centaur, was the son of Cronus and the nymph Philyra. Cronus wished to keep his love secret from Rhea and therefore consorted with Philyra in the guise of a horse which is the reason for Cheiron's form, half man and half horse. Cheiron married Chariclo, the daughter of Apollo, or of Perses, or of Oceanus, and among his children was Endeis the wife of Aeacus. Cheiron was distinguished for his justice, wisdom and kindness, and therefore many great heroes in their youth were his pupils. Among these were Achilles, Iason and Actaeon. Cheiron was a friend of Apollo and, like him, an excellent archer. Also he knew the art of healing, which he taught to Asclepius and to the sons of Asclepius, Machaon and Podalirius. Heracles accidentally wounded Cheiron in his battle with the other Centaurs, and because the arrow was poisoned with the blood of the Hydra, the wound was incurable. The pain was such that Cheiron wished to die, but could not because he was immortal. So, with the permission of Zeus, he gave his immortality to Prometheus and so died. Others say that the wound was incurred when Heracles visited Cheiron, and Cheiron, inspecting the hero's arrows, dropped one on his foot. Afterwards Cheiron became the constellation Centaurus which has 14 stars and rises on 3 May (CONCISE ENCYCLOPEDIA OF GREEK AND ROMAN MYTHOLOGY).
